If this subject, like many in our American schools, is taught merely as a subject, as a field of intellectual or sentimental interest, its presentation in our institutions will soon be of the past. But if it be related to present-day problems, so that it may shed the light of world-experience upon the perennial questions of mental and moral development, it will be of the highest value. The contributions of ancient and medieval educators to the world's progress, and our consequent debt to them, have been often and admirably treated. It is not my purpose to attempt such a characterization of those who have shaped educational history, but rather to point out some features of earlier educational theory and practice which have been found worthy enough to live, in some form and degree, to the present day. Many elements...
